The Cap and Gown 1990
The University of the South
Sewanee, Tennessee
Volume 92

To Andrew Nelson Lytle with thanks and gratitude for a continuing legacy of teaching and kindness

The world which Andrew Lytle inhabits is very different from yours or mine. While he may come down into ours for a moment or two to make a drink or cook some supper, Mr. Lytle dwells apart, hearing not the shrillness of our age but the echoes of a past that, for him, is not dead, but real, present, just receding.

Descended from Indian fighters and farmers, Mr. Lytle grew up surrounded by powerful reminders that the end of human life is not making money but pondering the mysteries of the land, and of the connections of kin and clan that inhabit it. "A farm is not a place to grow wealthy. It is a place to grow corn." And in growing corn, in living in close proximity to the earth and beasts and seasons, men were drawn to a sense of place, of belonging, that is difficult to understand in an era of corporate "relocations" and suburbia.

The sounds of that sort of world ring still in Mr. Lytle: the Union gunshot that struck his grandmother, then a child playing the streets of Murfreesboro, in the neck, filling her shoes with blood; it was she who first heard the sudden beat of Forrest's horses' hoofs on the hard turn pike of Middle Tennessee and the wild yell of his riders. Her grandson, however, hears them still, all these years distant.

Of Forrest, Mr. Lytle noted that the world over which the General and his critter company rode was closer to that of Henry II than it is to ours. "They are centuries apart; yet those centuries knew the orderly return of the seasons, saw the supernatural in the natural, moved about on foot, by horse and at sea by the wind." Our own century, yours and mine, has lost all of that forever. We are left, finally, with only the story of that heroic past.

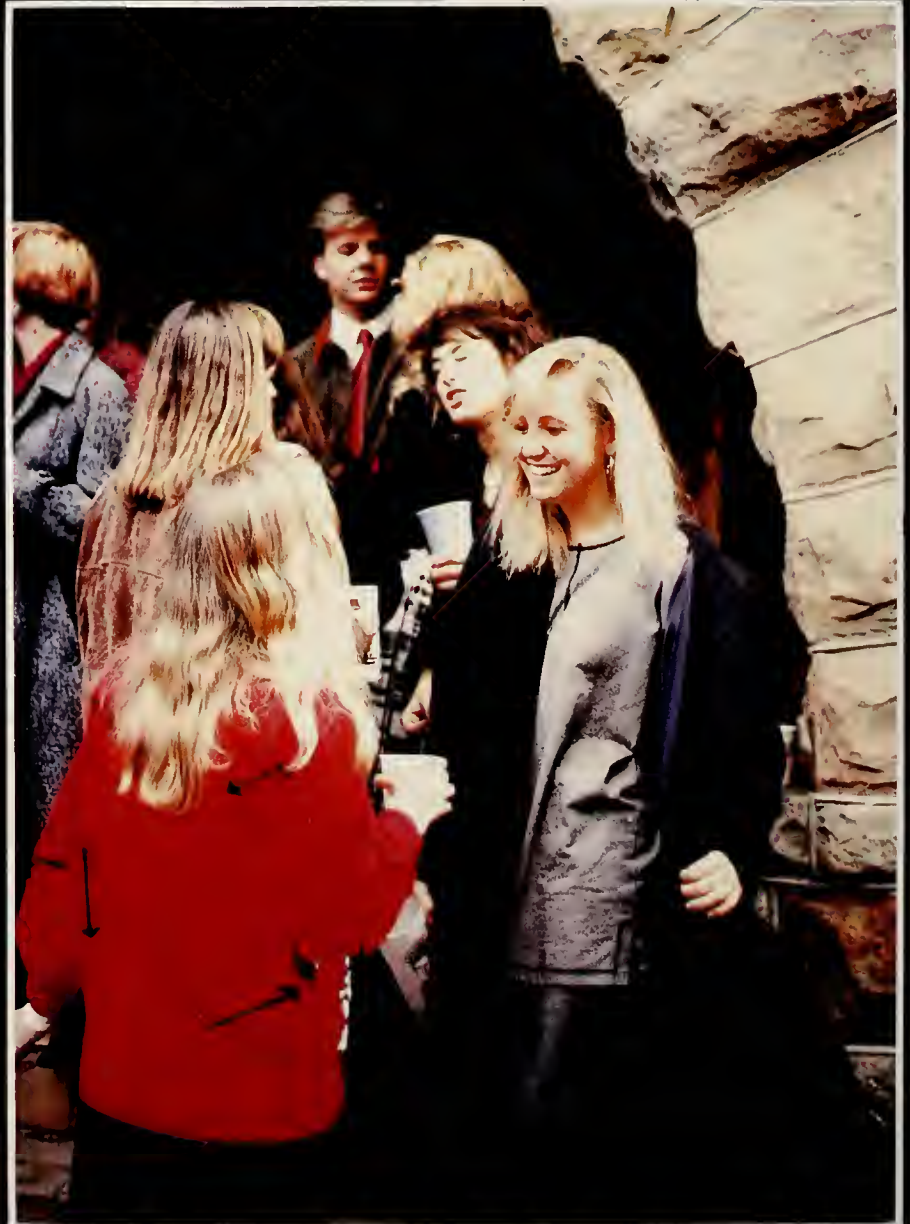

So our storytellers become our link to an older warmer world. Mr. Lytle hails from a time when giants must have walked the earth. He wrote with Ransom, Davidson, Warren, Tate; taught Flannery O'Connor, farmed, edited, criticized.

Mr. Lytle has said that in the end the hero always fails. "Never in the world are the powers of darkness finally overcome, for they inhabit matter; nor, without the cooperating opposites of light and dark, good and bad, would life as we know it be." And, for now, we have his stories of that eternal struggle and can hear in them, however dimly, the wild yell of the riders.

They said — These are the best years of your life. I laughed and answered — Then stop the world, I'm getting off now. However they couldn't, wouldn't, so I didn't. And I'm glad.

My special thanks to Lyn, Elizabeth, and Andrew who worked with me despite my ignorance. Without you the book would have been simply a collection of white pages and a cover.
Actually, the cover would have been questionable.
